The Journal of Hunger & Environmental Nutrition publishes manuscripts that advance knowledge across the range of research and practice issues in nutrition, food, and water security, health, agriculture, and the environment. The journal supports the professional growth of researchers and practitioners in these areas.

Studying the growing connection and interdependence between the environment, food, nutrition, and health, the journal comprehensively examines local, national, and international hunger and environmental nutrition issues — specifically food access, food security, food production, agriculture, and the interconnectedness of nutrition and health.

The Journal of Hunger & Environmental Nutrition is designed to provide current research and application information on public policy, legislation, and regulation related to sustainable ecosystems and the link with maintaining optimal nutrition and well-being for all people.
